ATOMIC MOUSE
in Bum-bum-bum-BOMB

Thought waves that read "DANGER" penetrated the deep sleep of Atomic Mouse. He had been out on a case for the past week without sleep, and after a great deal of planet-leaping, he had caught up with Count Gatto on Pluto, a little-known planet. It was tiring, this racing around the universe, but not tiring enough to prevent emergency thought waves from being received. Atomic Mouse awoke fast and was out of his bed at a bound. He had only been sleeping for an hour, after being awake for 148 hours, but a U-235 pill soon restored all his energy.

"What can it be?", Atomic Mouse wondered, concentrating heavily. He had just put Count Gatto behind bars for a good long stay, and was sure he was locked up well. It couldn't be Count Gatto! No, the thought waves he was receiving with his Atomic Sense Perception did not mention Count Gatto.

He bore down on his thoughts, chin in hand. He concentrated so heavily sparks began to fly from his ears and his hair stood on end with electrical atomic effort. In this way Atomic Mouse could determine where and when evil things were about to happen before they happened. Much time was saved and many bad things were prevented from happening in this way.

"AN" was received. Then A then T and then O then M than I then C came through the thought channels. Atomic Mouse turned on all his energy to receive the message. "This one really means something!" he said half-aloud. B then O then M then B came in, and then Atomic Mouse sprang through the window and aloft above the clouds in less time than it takes to look from the ground to the sky.

"An Atomic Bomb is loose in New York City! It may go off any minute, and if I don't miss my guess, the bomb is planted somewhere in the Charlton Building in Times Square!"

At supersonic speed, Atomic Mouse whistled through the stratosphere toward New York City. Atomic Mouse's hideaway is in the Rocky Mountains, on the very highest peak, so he can better receive thought waves without interference. From across 2500 miles, a mental warning had been flashed—of course, no one but Atomic Mouse could have been able to receive this warning, for it hadn't even been put into words as yet.

An Atomic Bomb in the Charlton Building, Times Square, New Work City! This was the building that housed the Al Fago Studios, the famous publication house that produced Atomic Mouse Comic Books and others. If someone evil were trying to destroy the Al Fago Studios with a bomb, it's possible he bore a grudge against Atomic Mouse for some good deed he had done, and was plotting to get back at him!

Within the time it took you to read the last paragraph, Atomic Mouse had sped across the width of the United States, from his cabin in the Rockies to the eighth floor of the Charlton Building in New York City. Al Fago, who puts Atomic Mouse's true-life adventures in comic book form, was just getting a drink of water as Atomic Mouse zoomed in through the window. Mr. Fago almost dropped the water at the surprise visit.

"Why, Atomic Mouse, what brings you to New York City?" asked Mr. Fago, "New adventures for the comics?" He drank the water hurriedly — the sudden appearance of Atomic Mouse from out of nowhere had unnerved him slightly. You see, Mr. Fago was used to seeing Atomic Mouse on paper as he drew him, and not in person.

"Hello, Mr. Fago! No—well, I do have a planet-hopping adventure chasing Count Gatto to tell you — but that can wait until another time. I just received a thought message that an atomic bomb is planted somewhere around Times Square in New York City, and it might be in this building or in this very studio!"

Mr. Fago really dropped the water when he heard this. "An atomic b-bomb? In this studio? What can I do to help you locate it?"

But Atomic Mouse was already scanning the eighth floor with his X-ray vision, searching out any trace of an atomic bomb. There was none. "Can't say that I see any part or parcel of an A-Bomb around here—I'm not familiar with New York City to any great extent, Mr. Fago. Can you give me some help on where I might track down an A-Bomb?"

"Well, maybe—maybe not," said Al Fago, thoughtful. He reached for the yellow pages of the phone book. "We might look under the A's and B's in the phone directory! Maybe just glancing at some addresses will give you some ideas!"

"There's a thought — let's look!" Atomic Mouse had read all of the names on the first two pages of the closely-printed phone book within three seconds after the page was opened. Within twenty seconds he had read and memorized every name and phone number under all the A's and B's of the yellow pages of the phone book.

"Any ideas?" Al Fago asked.

"I've got one lead—Atomic Bomb was listed under the BMT subway station at Times Square!" Atomic Mouse replied.

Al Fago looked up BMT and failed to see Atomic Bomb listed under it. Then he caught on. "Oh," he said, as Atomic Mouse leaped from the sill of the eight-story high window, "you mean you got thought waves on it as you read the address!"

"Exactly!" shouted Atomic Mouse, who was already out of sight as he plunged into the the crowded area of Times Square and headed for the BMT subway station. He entered the station and began scanning the platform and walls for signs of a bomb. A train thundered in the distance and headed into the BMT station. The crowd around Atomic Mouse grew and began to restrict his searching. He was about to look the luggage lockers over when the bright, booming subway train roared to a stop not two feet from him. Atomic Mouse then experienced something entirely new.

A mob of over three-thousand people descended upon the subway train and rushed into it, carrying Atomic Mouse along with them. Within 15 seconds Atomic Mouse found himself hurtled onto the train as the doors opened and then closed. He was caught in a huge mob of people, the way a sardine is caught in a can.

Now Atomic Mouse could have resisted the flow of people with his strength, but it would have hurt many people in the process. He stood there, crushed by the crowd, fearing to move for the sake of the people. If he broke out of the train, hurtling down the track to the next stop, it might wreck the train and injure many people! Atomic Mouse was too much of a gentleman to push out and hurt people, so he decided to stay until the next stop.

But the next stop was not better! And the next and the next were even more crowded! Even strong Atomic Mouse began to feel pushed in upon! In another forty minutes, Atomic Mouse came to a stop where he could leave the train! It was in a strange section—Brooklyn—which Atomic Mouse didn't know. He was lost! But not for long—Atomic Mouse took a moderate 5,000 foot leap into the air and circled around the entire city of New York. Times Square stood out like a piece of soot on a yard-full of snow, or like a piece of snow on a yard-full of soot, whichever way you happen to think of Times Square in relation to New York City.

In five seconds, Atomic Mouse was back in Al Fago's office. Al looked up from his drawing board. "Hi, Atomic Mouse! Any luck finding the bomb?"

Atomic Mouse wiped his brow. "No, but I found Brooklyn! I got shoved on the subway train by mistake and ended up out there!"

Al Fago brought a chair and a glass of water to Atomic Mouse. He was sympathetic, having been caught in Brooklyn by mistake once himself. "Here," he said, "sit down and take a drink of water! You probably need it after THAT ordeal!"

Atomic Mouse sat and had a drink of water. "Thanks," he said, gratefully. Just then Blanche Fago, Al's wife, hurried into the office, excited and shouting.

"Atomic Mouse!" Mrs. Fago shouted. "I heard about TWO PLACES on BROADWAY that have atomic bombs! Maybe those are the ones you're looking for!"

Before she had finished the sentences, Atomic Mouse was off again—this time he shot up the length of Broadway (which is the longest street in the world), checking both sides of the street with X-ray eyes for signs of A-Bombs. It was actually faster for him to cover Broadway in this way then wait for Mrs. Fago to tell him any more about where the addresses might be, for he covered the distance of the street in a split second, observing all as he went.

In six seconds he was back in the office—almost as soon as Mrs. Fago had completed the sentence. "You're right, Mrs. Fago—but one of the places is selling A-bomb toy kits—and the other one sells Atomic Balm for the hands!"

As Atomic Mouse sat there, thinking further, he noticed a crew-cut, cigar-smoking, boyish-looking gentleman leaving the ante-room of the offices. He was carrying a brief-case, and lettered across the brief case was — THE ATOMIC BOMB!

Without further talk, Atomic Mouse hurtled across the room, through the office door (splintering it as he went) and tackled the crew-cut cigar-smoking, boyish-looking gentleman with the brief case.

"Hey!" yelled the man.

"Hey!" yelled Al Fago, "that's Ray Gill, one of our writers, Atomic Mouse. Why'd you tackle HIM?"

Atomic Mouse tore open the brief case and found a story—not a bomb—entitled "The Atomic Bomb". "Sorry," said Atomic Mouse, "but we can't be too careful, can we? I have a notion my thought wave process is just a bit too sensitive—I'll have to lay off the U-235 pills for awhile till I get less senstive to thought messages! I should have known the first time I saw crowded Times Square that it wouldn't be a good place to set off an A-Bomb!"

"Why not?" asked Blanche and Al and Ray, curious.

"Because no one would even NOTICE it!" was Atomic Mouse's reply.

They all had a good laugh, and then Atomic Mouse flew back to his Rocky Mountain hideout.
